

Relativism

Is ethics in the eye of the beholder?

George Matthews, Pennsylvania College of Technology

2020

press "h" for help on keyboard controls

A basic distinction

facts

Factual statements report on how the world really is.

values

Statements about values express how we think things should be.

- Are claims about values just a matter of opinion?
- If they are just opinions, there would be little point to ethical debate and discussion.
- If they are not just opinion, what are they all about?

Moral relativism

According to moral relativism...

- Value judgments are personal, rooted in our sense of identity.
- They are absorbed from our cultural environments.
- Like cultural norms regarding food, manners and personal affairs they are not subject to critical evaluation.

Moral relativism

There is no disputing taste.

-- David Hume

QUESTION: are ethical norms like taste in food and thus subject to disagreement with no way of settling disputes? Either you like sushi or you don't...

A note on ethical theories

Every theory we will look at:

- Makes certain assumptions: we have to start somewhere.
- Has implications: if it is true, then we have to accept other stuff too.
- Requires support in an argument: none are obvious even if they might seem believable at first glance.

Implications of relativism

If relativism is true...

- There are no moral absolutes.

But this implies that there is nothing, no matter how repugnant it seems, that can truly be called evil, as long as somebody thinks of it as acceptable.

Implications of relativism

If relativism is true...

- Moral progress makes no sense.

Since progress assumes that there is a standard to compare one practice or belief with another and relativism denies the existence of any independent standards of moral evaluation, things can never get better they can only be different.

Implications of relativism

If relativism is true...

- We cannot really discuss ethical issues we people we disagree with.

If there is no common framework for discussion, we must live in morally distinct universes and can only talk past each other.

Is relativism true?

The argument from cultural differences

Different groups have different views on right and wrong.

Therefore there are no moral standards that can apply in all cases.

- Is this argument even valid?
- Do different views about how to deal with stop signs imply that there are no standards in that case?

Is relativism true?

The argument from learning

We acquire our sense of right and wrong from our immediate cultural environments, and these are different in different cultures.

Thus there are no such thing as moral universals.

- Doesn't this argument beg the question?
- Yes we learn things from those who raise us, but that tells us nothing about whether we can independently evaluate what we learn.

Is relativism true?

The argument from tolerance

Different cultures may have equally valid, but incompatible ways of regulating social interaction.

Thus in the interests of tolerance we should accept that relativism is true.

- The premise is true, but does this imply that that there are no deeper values that all cultures share and implement in different ways?
- Can a relativist really appeal to the moral value of tolerance?

The big question

Are moral claims more like aesthetic judgments?

- If so we would have individual preferences and that's all there is to it.

The big question

Or are moral claims more like judgments about facts or the law?

- We might disagree but there would in principle be some basis for figuring out who is right and who is wrong.

Assessing relativism

its appeal

its basis

questions

Relativism gives us a quick and easy way to account for disagreements about right and wrong and the fact that it may seem like we live in different moral universes than others.

Assessing relativism

its appeal

its basis

questions

Plus it gets us off the hook and out of the hard work of really trying to understand someone we deeply disagree with.

Assessing relativism

its appeal

its basis

questions

Arguments in favor of relativism tend to beg the question.

What does disagreement show about values, besides the fact that we tend to have different opinions on things?

Assessing relativism

its appeal

its basis

questions

Even granted that we acquire values from our cultural surroundings, it doesn't follow that we never move on from them.

Don't we all have the ability to independently reevaluate our cultural programming?

Assessing relativism

its appeal

its basis

questions

Yes tolerance of other peoples' approach to life is typically a good thing.

But wouldn't a relativist also have to accept that intolerance is just as "good" as tolerance?

Assessing relativism

its appeal

its basis

questions

Maybe our disagreements are so bitter because we agree on a deeper level.

What if our disagreements were about how to implement common core values?

Assessing relativism

its appeal

its basis

questions

All human cultures seem to share values like:

- Maintain social order and help the group survive.
- Don't always put yourself first.
- Honor the dead.
- Don't kill humans unless you have a compelling reason to do so.

Assessing relativism

its appeal

its basis

questions

Open questions:

- How deep to core values go?
- On what basis can we reevaluate the values we are born into?
- What are the limits to tolerance -- what exactly is not worthy of being tolerated and why?

Find out more

Moral Relativism: an in-depth examination at the Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy.

Crash Course video on Meta-ethics: A great short video reviewing the core concepts and debates in meta-ethics especially the question of whether ethical principles are relative.

Aren't Right and Wrong Just Matters of Opinion, Paul Rezkalla. This chapter from Introduction to Philosophy: Ethics explores further and illustrates what is at stake here.

Credits

Built with:

Rstudio

xaringan html presentation framework

Images by: Image by Javier Galvez, prafalarcomomarcos, sbistrodubai, Juan Gallardo, and Kevin Petit from Pixabay

download this presentation or print it

editorial suggestions and comments; requires a (free) GitHub account.